cation. Whatever be the information that you want to communicate, put it across as part of an interesting story and not as propaganda.

Where it worked:

comparethemarket.com is an insurance comparison website but there's nothing remotely drab about their highly successful 'Compare the Meerkats' campaign. Through the campaign which was launched in 2009, the company told the story that illustrated the various frustrations of Aleksandr Kolorov – a person who runs the website, 'comparethemeerkat.com.' Of course, the persona of Kolorov was entirely fictional but that didn't stop comparethemeerkat.com from getting more than 20 lakh hits in a single month, not to mention the large number of customers who were diverted to the insurance comparison website.

3. Keep your message simple

If there's one thing that no audience likes, it is to expend more mental or physical energy than they absolutely have to in order to understand your message. After all, the whole purpose of brands is to make life simpler for the people, isn't it? Keeping the message as simple as you can is a practice that's been cherished ever since commercial advertising began in earnest. And that's not going to change either. Actually, with people getting more number of messages coming their way from multiple channels (television, print, social media, websites, hoardings, t-shirts...) you have to be utterly simple with your message if you want it to properly register in the audi-
