

into that sort of thing). We'll take you through a step-by-step guideline on how to establish a functioning, effective Facebook page and manage content on it wisely. For the purpose of this article, we take you through the establishment of a Facebook media platform for Scyther, a fictional company I just invented that aims to market upmarket shaving kits and man grooming equipment.

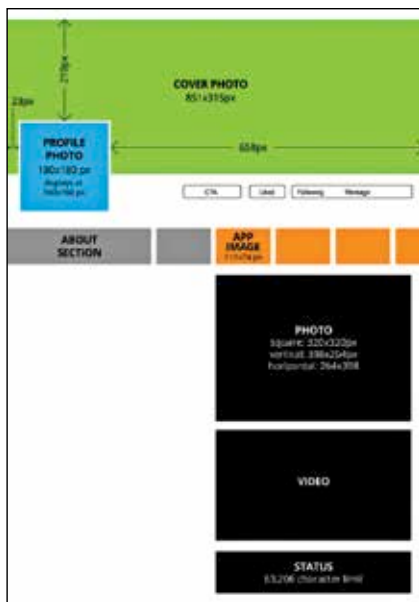

Setting up the page

First things first, is Facebook media marketing right for you? To find out, ask yourselves these questions

- ◆ What is the content I am trying to market?
- ◆ Who am I trying to market the content to?
- ◆ Am I tech savvy enough to pile through large amounts of data?
- ◆ Should I be doing something else instead? Print media? Hire a yesteryear actor for TV commercials? Door to door sales?

Done? Good. Now throw those answers out the window, because Facebook media management is for everyone, irrespective of the needs or means of the person. The tools available have been successfully used by a wide range of people right from huge corporations to market household cosmetics to small non-profits to ensure pet vaccinations.

The first thing to do then, is to actually go ahead with the process of creating a page. The only management you need to ensure at this point is to make the name of the page as succinct as possible. There is a tendency for people to include a descriptor of the nature of services that they offer. If you do decide to opt for that, ensure that the descriptor is small, say a maximum of two or three words. Clunky titles tend to be

Sample template of a Facebook page