problematic for people to reach out to and ruins the overall effectiveness of your online campaign before it even begins. Something along the lines of ‘Scyther - Shaving equipment’ would be acceptable. ‘Scyther - Shaving equipment for the mantastic man’ is too verbose.

One of the things that is often taken for granted but have a huge impact is a good cover photo for your page. It is often the first thing that visitors to the page see and has a huge impact on the visitor’s perception of your content. It would be a good idea to present an image that best represents the kind of content you want to market, or a picture of the audience that you want to target. The two seconds that a fidgety Facebook user spends looking at your cover photo could determine whether he/she spends time browsing through the content on your page. Ensure that you find the right picture and also make sure that the image is of the right size and quality for a cover picture.

Another important aspect of your page is the ‘About’ section. It is vital that this section contains all of the information that you would want a consumer to know about your content.

Tell your story, but keep it brief and make sure you mention your mission statement and/or tagline. This is also a good place to include links to your other social media accounts and a website, if you have one, to establish a good cross platform community of fans. Regularly update this section with renewed information if necessary and remember that if a consumer
