

your page remains active through the day and targets different segments of your target audience.

While it may be tempting to do so, do not reshare the same post beyond a certain point, over and over again. Once you have established a firm base of fans, it is annoying for the viewer to have to deal with the same image repeatedly. Strategic resharing of images is vital; ensure that the reshares are properly spread out and that the image isn't reshared at the same time every day. If you need a certain post to get more attention, say an offer or a limited edition set of Euro 2016 themed razors, there are two things you can do. A good first step would be to pin the post to your page for the duration that you would require. This ensures that the post is the first thing visitors to your page will see. Another thing that you can do is to boost and sponsor your post to increase the outreach. We'll delve a little more into how to do that soon.

Make sure every photo or video you post has a caption. Captionless media is not just annoying, it can be downright misleading at times. At the same time, long winded captions are also a drag to read through. Simple one or two line descriptions along with a link to further information if the most effective way of getting your message across.

A couple of good tips: An online website Buddymedia found that posting full length URL's actually got more clicks than shortened ones. Also, posts with just links tend to perform poorly. Instead, try adding a photo and include a link in the photo description. This is the most effective way to
