Schedule in advance. Don't have any "zero post" days.

for a budget of ₹1,000 per day. This is potentially the most economical way of getting your content out there and ensuring that people are aware of and are interested in what you have to offer. Even if your turnover is low and only 5 people respond to the advert and decide to purchase products from Scyther, say for ₹300 each, that's still a profit of ₹500 you get to make. Thank you, Zuckerberg.

Beware though, excessive boosting of posts, or boosting of the wrong posts may lead to the page being classified as spam, which is something we don't really want. Play it safe, and this is a sure way of increasing page support and building a larger fan base.

Taking care of your fans

The most important thing for page sustenance is to ensure that your fans feel loved. One of the most crucial things is to respond to messages. Facebook displays the response rate and average response time on the page itself and to your fans it is a huge indicator of how much you value them. The responses need not be long winded messages, simple two line responses are quite sufficient in most cases. It is also a good practice to respond to comments on posts and respond to feedback, even if it is extremely harsh and unwarranted criticism. As a page you cater to the fans and they are under no obligation to like your content, it's your job to ensure they do. Treat the fan like you would treat an ill-tempered toddler, coax and cajole them into liking you.

Another good way of connecting with your fans is by constantly sharing milestones on Facebook, which Facebook lets you do with a simple click of a button. With a simple note of thanks, say for reaching 5000 likes, you're telling your fans that you cherish their support and this keeps them engaged. Seasonal greetings are also a good idea, but again, be careful not to overdo it.
