

Experimenting

Despite all the useful (hopefully) info that you've read, the best way to manage social media platforms is to experiment. Run a trial page for a couple of months before going in for the real thing. The good thing about marketing on Facebook is that it is relatively inexpensive and shutting shop is really simple. In return, if your page does take off, the payback is immense. There is no real right way to start or run a page because Facebook is such a volatile medium. Ensure that you keep changing things up and keep your fans engaged and the rest of the work follows automatically.

It may also be useful to have a look at how some popular pages are constructed and try and learn from their design aesthetic. An excellent online marketing campaign that has recently come into the picture is the one run by Ustraa a male-centric cosmetic company which runs a popular Facebook page and some stellar advertisements through selective targeting of audiences. Try going through every page that you see on your timeline

Constantly gauge your audience's interest levels and see what sticks that has been sponsored and identify which elements about the design you like/dislike and experiment on your own page.

Integrate your social media campaigns across different platforms. Odds are, the same fans who follow you on Facebook also follow you on Twitter and Instagram and Tumblr. It's important that you set uniform, yet unique marketing strategies across these different forums.

Above all, be professional. Despite what it may seem like, people genuinely value professionalism on Facebook. A good social media management strategy can go a long way in winning your content the fans it truly deserves. Hopefully, the information in this article will be useful in helping you setting up and improving the quality of your page and propel you to the internet validation that you crave for. Go on, be a star. 