

being able to reach all your followers, thereby allowing them to retweet your content is reposting your tweets. This doesn't mean that you post all your tweets multiple times. Rather, the tweets that have the most amount of original content should be reposted for maximum visibility. This brings us to Original Content. Original Content is difficult to find.

While it would be very unreasonable to ask you to make every tweet as memorable as this quote, it only further illustrates the point of Original Content. It is the God that rules the Twitter universe. The account with the most Original Content inevitably (just like Shakespeare), rule the roost.

It is the traditional Fight Club type ethos to believe that everything is a copy of a copy of a copy. However, in this case, original content just means something relatively 'zanier' than the ordinary. Something that will pique the collective interest of your followers. Accounts like Betfair Poker and Paddy Power are prime examples of such content. They regularly update their twitter account with the same tired old jokes that are as old as time itself, but the very fact that a corporate account tweets jokes is the reason they're so popular. Original Content is king in the battle for Twitter supremacy.

It is impossible to guarantee an increase in Twitter followers just by adhering to these general pointers. Hopefully though, if you were setting up a brand new company account on Twitter, and proceeded to follow each step diligently, you will be able to gain a respectable number of followers.