

These followers, however, aren't here to stay. They need to be given a constant stream of intelligent, well-timed tweets so as to keep their attention from wandering. This conveniently brings up the next big Twitter question: What kind of content is most suited to the Twitter-sphere?

Before we dive into this rabbit hole, let it be made clear that Twitter is a giant web of interconnected entities, be it followers, content, marketing, brand popularity, or so on, and so forth. That is, no amount of good Twitter-suited content will make up for your lack of followers, and you won't be able to retain your followers without said content. A combination of the two is potent, and if managed properly, will make your twitter account very successful.

Now, back to that rabbit hole.

Marketable Content

If you were to open any social networking site, you would encounter several basic content-types. They would include Videos, Images, Texts, Quotes, Lists, Memes, and so on. A combination of all these types are found as well, but on Twitter, you would be hard pressed to combine more than 2 because of the 140 character limit. A type-by-type comparison is the most effective way of seeing what the users of Twitter favor most.

Content is the second of the three crucial elements of a Twitter account. Much like your follower count, it takes time and effort to make it. Content will be key when it comes to retaining the mass of followers that you've accrued.