

The third of the three is hashtags. With the hashtag, you see the usage of analytics as never before. Complex algorithms work 24x7 to accumulate all your Twitter activity and finally show you what the analysis reveals you will most be interested in.

involved. There are loads of intangible details that might go wrong (or right) on any given day, and to predict all of them, you might need one of those doomsday machines. Amongst all of this though, there are two major factors that you can easily get right – content, and distribution. If you can get these correct, there is a considerably higher chance of you being able to trend your hashtag than there would be if you just didn't bother.

- ◆ Let's start with content.

Twitter is all about starting a conversation everyone wants to be a part of, regardless of the conversation being started by individuals, groups of people, or major corporations. To create a successfully trending hashtag, you'll have to first create one that encourages people to talk, and has a far reach. The Twitter account @midnight regularly trends hashtags as common as “#NewHarryPotterBooks”, “#RuinAMovieQuote” etc. As you go through a list of their trended hashtags, you notice how it is generic enough to appeal to a large audience, and specific enough to fit into 140 characters.
