

Now that you have done all this, and are in possession of a plan, all you can do is create a call to action. Either paying Twitter to push your hashtag up to the top of the trends tab, or using your own account to give it visibility can do this. It is probably a good idea to do both.

Now that we've got all of this out of the way, it is time to stress on the 'human' part of Twitter.

Unlike every other social networking site, Twitter just has a mere 140 characters to put your view across. It is key to not make your twitter account

Much like a neural web, Twitter is a combination of the thoughts of millions of people. No matter how much analysis is done, it'll always serve you better to be as close to human as a Twitter account can be.

look like a bot, for it almost always acts like a deterrent to your followers. To do that, you could adopt a more conversational style, using colloquial language instead of a strictly formal text. It is really important to understand that Twitter isn't a tool that is used for advertising, strictly speaking. It is a tool for people with varying interests to interact with each other. If used correctly, however, it can be leveraged, within its own paradigm, to your own benefit.
