

and budding formal relationships. The most common use case is that of working professionals looking for jobs, and businesses looking to hire. Having said this, LinkedIn is also choc-a-bloc with high level management and budding entrepreneurs trying to increase their reach, while looking for other businesses and like-minded working professionals to connect with.

This platform has a unique system of functioning and provides features you would expect from a site offering virtual résumés, and more. Individuals are allowed to have a Personal profile page as well as a Company profile page, which helps LinkedIn provide services geared towards small businesses and big ones alike.

Your Profile is your LinkedIn page that describes your career history, education, interests, and other related content you may want to publish. On Profile pages, other networkers can provide personal endorsements about the user, if they have had professional relations with him/her before and have something positive to contribute to the user's résumé. On the other hand, a Company Page helps LinkedIn members learn about your business, brand, and job opportunities. Any LinkedIn member can follow a Company Page, which gives you a major hint why this is the hottest network be on, if you're looking to leverage the power of a platform with a million+ users. A function similar to personal endorsements exists for business pages, which means customers can give valuable recommendations about the company's service and help increase (or bring down) the business' ratings and worthiness in the network.

Since LinkedIn commands a higher ranking in eyes of Google and other major search engines, you'll want to latch onto it. In simple words, LinkedIn company pages are highly authoritative and likely to rank in search results for users looking for your business. If your page is well crafted and maintained, and you've managed to pull the right SEO tactics in the right places, you're likely to be seen much higher on a Google search result for services provided by your business, or anything else remotely related to your brand. Because of the nature of LinkedIn, a site all about professionals and businesses, the brand signals are strong and valuable when it comes to a business' online presence.

If you're looking to market your personal or business brand on a platform as exclusive and specifically targeted as LinkedIn, it would bode well to maintain a constantly updated Profile and Company page. A few tips and tricks to get you started on the right track.
