

Raising awareness is a key component of your social strategy on LinkedIn

Therefore, it is technically possible for an organisation like the Madras Boat Club, for example, to specifically place adverts on the screens of all maritime engineers and sailors across the world to advertise a potential job opening. It is also possible to advertise on a cost per click or a cost per impression basis. Companies that seek to improve the brand image and identity of their organisation without necessarily needing a redirection towards their hyperlinks can choose the former to minimise their costs. Direct sponsored content is also a good place for companies to test their messaging before releasing this message across slightly more expensive advertising platforms.

Text ads are slightly more economical, and targeted towards those on a tight budget. These advertisements relay text based content across platforms, again to a specific target audience as required by the recruiter. These advertisements are usually used for filling up openings in jobs or other temporary contracts which is why this option is offered with the same cost per click or cost per impression basis as the Native Advertising option. The adverts placed through this option tend to be short lived. However these adverts are displayed only on the desktop version of LinkedIn and not on mobile platforms.

There are a few features on LinkedIn that are unavailable at the moment that the website is working on, according to some reports. These include an option to schedule advertisements at particular times to ensure maximum outreach, which is an option that other social media websites like Facebook