

already offer. One feature of LinkedIn that sets it apart from other social media platforms is the Campaign Manager, a dedicated platform that provides a central console from which an organisation can run its campaign. The advertisements are also extremely well curated and reviewed to ensure an environment where professionalism is the order of the day.

For self-advertising, display and text ads make for better choices, and work well for campaigns on a tight budget. For those who have extra cash to spend, Sponsored Content, Sponsored InMail and Dynamic Ads provide a stringer visual hook. One can get a clear idea by going through the LinkedIn policies available on their page.

However, at the end of the day, if you are looking to sell products that cater to a business-to-customer segment, LinkedIn is not the right place for you. For products and services that require a personal touch, a microblogging platform like Tumblr provides solutions more tailored to your needs.

Tumblr

Tumblr is a platform used as a personal page to display personal artefacts. A large segment of its users use the site as a creative outlet for their artwork, writing and photography. For many creative professionals, the site serves as a personal portfolio of sorts, served with a dollop of personalisation. Tumblr currently hosts more than 200 million blogs, and the majority of these blogs are run by young people (half of Tumblr's visitor base is under age 25). But this means that businesses that don't cater to young people's interests or aren't relatable to young people in some way are not poised for success on the network. However, for any sort of marketing needed for business-to-customer ventures, and especially those that need a touch of humour and zing to make their campaign stand out, Tumblr is the place to be. If your brand matches these criteria, but has utilised the power of Tumblr yet, you need to be looking at how to effectively add Tumblr to your marketing efforts.

Every user maintains a Tumblr page, which is a blog of sorts. The main Tumblr page contains a dashboard with options for blog maintenance and such, and across its top, above the posts, is a bar that features each type of post that a user can share on Tumblr. Users can click on the type of post they plan to share, which brings up a box in which they can create their posts.

There is a plethora of content that can be posted, from images to videos to text to gifs, and more, which only serves to emphasize the informality and creativity that Tumblr has to offer.