

since Google+ is closely tied with Google, a leading factor that determines whether your campaign was made or broken, it deserves special attention and a slightly altered strategy.

Don't ignore Google+

For a business or personal brand that has a physical location, a Google+ profile helps integrate their location on Google Maps. And since one would want accurate results for Google search for your business, maintaining an up-to-date profile is a must.

Google+ offers certain features not available on other networking platforms, due to which it has a sizeable following. To capitalise on it, a complete Google+ profile, replete with an appropriate and possibly appealing profile picture, and contact details, would help maintain a constant and accurate social presence. To add to this, Google+ has a feature, Communities, which, as the name suggests, is online communities devoted to multiple topics, however niche they might be. Targeting these communities for marketing campaigns makes most sense, as you have, at your fingertips, a group of individuals deeply interested in the services you are providing.

Feedback from these communities would also be invaluable, which is why it is best to leverage their power.

To keep your page updates, posting frequent status updates and sharing links related to your business, and possibly linking back to a personal blog/webpage, would help increase active engagement.

With the inclusion of paid advertisement on Google+, there is a huge population you can still reach out to with targeted advertisements. These paid advertisements, called +Post ads, are available to all AdWords advertisers with a significant number of followers. So in case you are already paying for a Google AdWords subscription, creating and maintaining a Google+ account would only serve to increase the potential customer base.
