

1. Buffer

What with the insane number of social platforms out there, not to mention the insane number of active users for each, a business would want to make use of many or most of the platforms to reach out to a wider audience. Manually scheduling the updates on multiple accounts day after day would be a good recipe for the asylum. That's why there's Buffer. It not only helps you schedule your updates to multiple accounts on Twitter, Facebook, LinkedIn and Google+, you can also do follow-up on how each post performed. In fact, the latest iOS version even allows sharing and scheduling of posts from within other apps like Safari. Another useful feature allows you to share a link that you found in your browser, without leaving the app!

Pro(s):

Good support for multiple accounts

Con(s):

Limited number of social platforms

2. Hootsuite

One of the most popular social media management tools out there, Hootsuite covers a wide base of social networks like Twitter, LinkedIn, Facebook, WordPress, Google+ and Foursquare. The tool generates weekly analytics reports while there are some handy team management facilities available—like issuing private messages and delegating tasks to different employees. These facilities can be particularly of help if more than one person is involved in handling the social media accounts.

Pro(s):

Suitable if multiple managers are handling an account

Con(s):

The interface is not as intuitive as you need it
