

MANAGING MESSAGING APPS

Can you integrate messaging apps into your social media management strategy?
Let's find out...

The rise in messaging apps has led to a shift in social activity which no longer happens exclusively in public spaces or even on social websites. The rise in the number of users of messaging apps has led to this change in consumer behaviour and brands need to suitably adjust their marketing strategy likewise. It's a fact that while most users tend to get rid of apps periodically after installing them, messaging apps are an exception. More users today tend to spend time on WhatsApp and other messaging apps as opposed to social sites such as Facebook or Google Plus. Research on consumer behaviour has also indicated that while instant messages are read frequently and response time is as short as 90 seconds, emails take a bit longer.

While many brands have their own set of apps, it has been observed that consumers tend to uninstall apps after a short usage period. For brands, it takes a lot of time and investment towards building an app and then to have to focus on marketing it to existing and new consumers. From a consumer