

brand of the premium vodka in Argentina. To get an invite, users had to please Sven. This resulted in a viral campaign generating tons of publicity for the new brand at a fractional cost for the firm.

Emoticons available on WhatsApp

With WhatsApp, a limiting factor is that messages are intimate and can only be shared with people who have your brand's contact number on their phone. The matter needs to be non-intrusive and engaging. Brands should be careful to not overuse WhatsApp. It works best if you do not send more than two-three messages a day so a consumer doesn't get irritated. If it's spam, users tend to block instantly and remember that WhatsApp doesn't allow traditional ads unlike other messaging apps. Therefore, brands need to come up with interesting campaigns to ensure that users add your number and remain engaged. One way to do is to ask for customer feedback, a practise started by Adidas recently and offer some freebies or valuable information to consumers.

Clarkes, the premier shoe maker made use of WhatsApp by building virtual characters for its Desert Boot campaign wherein consumers were redirected towards videos, audios and other promo material.

An agricultural scientist, Dr. Amrik Singh in India is offering valuable information on rice cultivation to poor farmers free of cost through WhatsApp. Rekhta, an Urdu poetry sharing portal offers daily Urdu poetry messages through WhatsApp. All users need to do is to add the number for receiving up to three messages a day. Rekhta's surge in user base was primarily a result of its deciding to take marketing through WhatsApp. One of the main reasons why every brand should include WhatsApp in its marketing strategy is the huge subscriber base. At over one billion, it is the biggest messaging

