

SOCIAL SINS

We are all guilty of committing some of them. Don't do it, though, for the sake of your social management repertoire.

Social media management should rank right up there along with firefighting and witch hunting as one of the toughest jobs around. Not because the practitioners of the job face threat to their lives but because of the simple fact that SMM can never be boiled down to a science. At no point can you say with complete assurance that something will work. The best you can do is adapt best practices from before and apply it and hope for the best. And, of course, learn through trial and error, seeing what works and what doesn't for your community and social channel.

What this means is that there's no need to complicate your life as a Social Media Manager. You will do well enough to keep from doing these 'cardinal sins' that have the potential of making your work day(s) downright hellish.

1. Ignoring your audience

Okay, this might make you scratch your head. Why would anyone ignore an audience when the entire purpose of SMM is to build and engage an audience? But instances of not responding to some comment by a customer on social media are unfortunately plentiful. Not only could this turn away
