

that particular customer from the brand, if s/he is a major influencer in social platforms, the experience may get shared amongst other leading to a rather large number of people feeling turned off by your brand's apathy towards its customer.

2. Deleting a customer's comment

Social media has not only given brands a powerful tool to connect with their customers, it has also given the latter the power to make their opinions about products/brands/news known instantaneously. And related to brands, there can be instances when a certain customer has some negative feedback about the brand. In fact, you can be sure that there will be occasional negative comments. However, instead of hitting the panic button-which here means deleting the comment so that not many would see it, the brand should address the issue openly and try and solve it. The customer could understand that human errors may occur with a brand, but trying to hide an error seriously undermines your trust value.

3. Doing the 'bot' thing

When was the last time you actually enjoyed having an online conversation with a robot on the other end? If the answer is "never" then you know that you should frame thoughtful content for your audience and not the automated variety that'll just about suck all the joy out of the person on the other end.

4. Creating accounts and rarely using them

Social networking platforms are a dime a dozen. Okay, maybe not that many but still there are more than you could recount in a single sitting. And it can be awfully tempting to sign up on all of them
