

so that you can have a brand presence across platforms. But, it's better not to do that if you don't have the resources to keep all the accounts regularly updated. You will end up getting the bad reputation of being a brand that's not committed about what it does- an idea the audience could link to your core business faster than you may think.

5. Having the same strategy for all social platforms

Not every social platform is created equally. And for that reason, you shouldn't apply the same strategy across platforms. The type of interaction would vary from platform to platform, and so will the kind of audience. Having then the same strategy for all the platforms will be like adding sugar to everything-including tea and curry in the hope that it will make everything tastier.

6. Not adding a personal element

Sure, you are acting on behalf of a company, but one thing with social platforms is that establishing trust is of pivotal importance. And for us humans, it's always re-assuring to know that we are interacting not with some faceless entity but with real people. Having snaps of some of the team members and sharing some info about them would go a long way in keeping your audience comfortable.

7. Posting too much

One thing that sets apart a savvy SMM from the novice is limiting the number of posts to an optimal level. Too many updates could exhaust the audience. It's always ideal to understand what works for your audience and update with posts of that variety.