

8. Being formal ALL.THE.TIME!

There's a certain element of formality that's associated with any customer-business relationship. One can say that it's almost unavoidable. However, when it comes to social media interactions, you can chill out a bit. In fact, you should chill out a bit for the social platforms strike a balance between real-world social scenarios when you can be casual and the scenario of an e-mail wherein you send an official sounding mail and wait for the response that may or may not come. This makes a mix of both formality and reasonable casualness a good approach.

9. Investing in click farms

Succumbing to the temptation of buying 'likes' for your Facebook page can be disastrous. For one thing, it'll be hard to try out newer strategic marketing approaches since you can't possibly measure the results of a social campaign if you have brought clicks from clickfarms. Then, there's the matter of internet biggies like Facebook, Google and Youtube being meticulous about "fake like" auditing- this means your business might get banned from social pages, making it hard for you to maintain a strong online presence. Also, clickfarms are synonymous with slave labour in the modern era. Associating with such establishments then can be wrong on so many levels.

As mentioned at the beginning of this article, the job of a Social Media Manager can be tough. However, it's also a fact that SMM is one of the most significant designations for a company in the present era. It's imperative to garner attention in the social platforms if the brand is to remain relevant and that in turn will affect the entire employee base of the company, not to mention all the people in the businesses associated with the company. A weighty job that certainly can do without the pitfalls listed above. 