

Platform-specific marketing techniques

There are quite a few good video sharing platforms which you can use. Here, we provide tips on using some of them.

1. Vine

Vine is community-minded in that it allows a mutual interaction between the audiences and the users. Owing to the ‘sweet n short’ format of Vines, they are extremely shareable.

The fundamental facet of Vine is that it supports individual creativity while at the same time allows you to interact with an audience who may be looking for simple solutions to everyday problems. This gives you great opportunities to explore multiple methods to gain the followers’ attention.

Tips:

Cater to the community: Make content that would work in the context of community interaction. Engage in such interactions and participate frequently.

Blend the creative with the practical: You can try a demonstration of your product or relate something that’s interesting about your brand. The creativity comes in the presentation.

Leave the audience wanting more: A sequential strategy may be adapted by having a series of vines, posting at regular intervals so that people will come back.

Sell what you stand for rather than the product: People don’t really visit Vine to check out product advertisements.

2. Instagram

You can include short video clips in Instagram that can be of use to your target audience. And more brands and businesses are taking to the platform. It’s again a ‘community and culture’ channel – so most brands showcase their work culture etc. on Instagram rather than sell products directly.
