

a move is that even if the account is compromised you can get the social profile to call the phone number and provide you the option to recover your account. Almost all the major social networks have this feature. It's well worth your time to go through the account settings and enable the function.

Make use of the privacy options on the social network

One of the simplest ways in which a hacker can access recovery info on you is by, well, looking at your profile. For instance, in Facebook one of the recovery questions is about the colour of your dog. Now assume that you

A number, so that recovery is always an option have posted a dog's picture on your profile. Since it's posted publicly anyone can see the picture. This holds true for other bits of information like the relatives' maiden names etc.

So, unless you're a celeb who wishes to flaunt each and every move that he or she makes in the course of a day, it's probably a good idea to re-assess the privacy settings on all social profiles and alter them according to your requirements.

Be wary of suspicious links

The social media platform you are on may be cent per-cent reliable. But that's not the case with all the people who use the platform, and one may not be sure that the folks who appear there are in fact who they claim to be.
