

such 'utilities' that are promoted, there may also be those that are promoted with malicious intents by crooks. These apps may be promoted as things that enhance the functionalities of your social network or something similar but which in reality will be intended only for getting your sensitive information.

Be very sceptical about too-good-to-be-true offers

The social media is where you learn that your favourite nephew got a special certificate for participating in the school's annual dance competition. It's also where you learn that you can earn a hundred million dollars if only you would follow the shared link and give certain information. Information of the latter kind is most definitely bound to be a spam. Sometimes, such updates come from sources that appear to be from reliable sources, like, say the Coca-Cola company maybe?

Avoid the unwanted, avoid a whole lotta headaches!

The bottom-line is that whenever there's an offer than promises way more than what your intuition tells you an offer should, or can offer, you should be wary of it. Clicking on the link could compromise your internet security. And be doubly careful if they ask for such sensitive information as your bank account details. Before taking any action check the website of the
