Logitech G230

The Logitech G230 Stereo Gaming Headset can't really be called a budget headset by any yardstick. But what you can say for sure is that it's superbly comfortable. Sure you could get better performing headsets out there but will they be as comfortable? Probably not. And we all know how strenuous those 8 hour gaming sessions can be.

Razer Kraken USB

This USB-based gaming headphone has been the workhorse at the Digit Test Labs for quite a while now. And unlike most Razer products (especially those with moving parts) it has stood the test of time. Being USB you won't be able to utilise any fancy gaming specific audio cards you may have invested in however because it's USB there's a certain amount of convenience it offers. The mic is of excellent quality and the audio is not bad at all. The only negative is in the comfort domain. They tend to get hot and sweaty.

ASUS STRIX 7.1

Like the old Razer Tiamat this is one of those rare headphones with "true" surround. That means it's not just the illusion of surround sound created with DSP effects but rather it's achieved using a whole number of discrete drivers. It looks cool too with its "owl" eyes. Availability might be an issue though.
