

You can earn money through youtube but making enough money will requires time and efforts community. You should start a channel, work on creating good content and then market your channel well. And slowly but steadily money will start pouring in through advertisements. Maybe you get a branding contact or sponsorship and a couple of your videos get viral. And then you can think about joining that top earners list.

So instead of asking the obviously ambitious but far-fetched questions like the one above, you should be more focused on your content and equipment. Figuring out the what, when, how, why of your YouTube channel is key to being successful.

And we have the answers to all these questions in further chapters. But first you need to know what it takes to become a successful YouTuber, don't you?

Okay, so tell me what does it take to become a YouTuber?

Let's get a few things out of the way. No you don't need a great camera or professional video editing skills. You are good to go even if you just have a decent smartphone and learn the rest along the way. And no, you don't need to come up with a completely new wacky idea that will make your videos go viral instantaneously (though if you have something like that already in your mind, then you are good to go.)

You need to figure out your niche, the type of content you want to put out, whether they're funny videos of your dog or a travelogue. You need to be consistent and put out frequent videos. You need to engage with your