

audience and take their feedback seriously (albeit not too seriously). You need to be ready to put in time and effort, just like any other thing. Most importantly, you need to enjoy what you are doing. After all, that is one thing common in the success story of all famous YouTubers.

Can I turn this into a career?

Well generally speaking, yes, it is possible to turn not only YouTube but almost anything into a full-time career. A recent survey puts average freelancer's annual income at $39,000, which is higher than average annual income for the more 'traditional jobs'. A number of people from around the world are successfully earning good money through their blogs, vlogs and social media.

Start alongside your day job till you get enough subscribers

But quitting your job right now because you want to make a YouTube channel isn't advisable.

You need to have a sizable amount of subscribers before you can start earning some real money. But still not enough to sustain you as your primary source of income. Google has a rewarding ad-revenue sharing program, but it requires a lot of views and most of the successful YouTubers earn the majority of their money from branding deals. Also, money isn't all you get from this. You get to test the latest products, gadgets, dresses and at times even keep them. So yes, it is possible to turn YouTube into a full-blown career but it will not happen overnight.
