

Solving common problems

If you run a 'How-to' channel, you should always ensure that you provide solutions to the common issues first. (If you are in a niche category, try to solve the most common problems in that category first). The numbers simply work out as the common problems are the most likely to be searched and will help people discover your channel.

Freebies

It's a good idea to give away freebies once in a while even if you have a paying audience. It could be download links or some extra content (or anything else that your inventive mind could come up with).

Be careful not to misguide

Be extra-cautious about not putting out misleading/wrong information. Once credibility goes down, it will be hard to rebuild.

How to come up with original ideas

It's pretty obvious that there are just too many YouTube videos in the world, regardless of the category that you choose. Unless you are able to stand out in this clutter, there's all the possibility that your channel will get drowned in a plethora of others.

The solution obviously is to have an original idea in your channel (For perspective, if 'man' is a common enough idea, 'Superman'- someone who can fly and has strength no mortal can aspire to would be the original idea).

However, notwithstanding the heading of this section, there aren't any sure-shot tip(s) that you can follow to achieve it.

But we reckon it can be safely said that original ideas almost always come from something that you have experienced in your own daily life. Maybe it's an issue that your friend asked you to help solve that's to become the basis for your YouTube channel. Or maybe it's something malicious that happens in your neighbourhood which inspires you to start a channel – one that would focus exclusively on social issues in neighbourhoods.
