

The bottom-line is to keep your mind open about the things that you perceive/ experience throughout the day. An incident may not feel like much at the time but it could be the seed for a strong YouTube idea.

Tips to present similar types of content in different ways

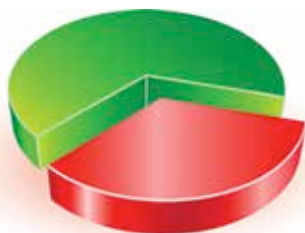

So that we aren't fooling ourselves, let us acknowledge that not everyone strikes upon an original idea.

But that's not necessarily a bad thing- provided you still have a topic that you feel strongly about. It doesn't matter if the topic is something that is already discussed/presented. What matters in this context is bringing a freshness to the presentation. So, here we look at some ways in which similar types of content could be presented in different ways.

Change the medium

Yes, it's still videos that we are talking about. But the point is that some types of content may look more interesting in a different medium than the one it was originally created in.

For instance, let's say that you have a pie chart that you want to explain in the video. By using some simple tools, you can add little movements to the chart and what would have been a boring 2D chart would transform into an interesting 2D (or 3D) chart! Add some voice over and you are good to go!

A little change makes a whole lot of difference

Look through the prism of another

This, in fact is a technique that has been used by storytellers for decades. The idea is simple: you need to present something as though it's from a different genre. For example, think of how a typical Bollywood action film involving fun antiheroes and

Get a different perspective