

a single dialogue. Another interesting way to use close-up is with two characters. Putting in two characters' heads in such a tight frame gives the feeling intense love.

Remember the term 'breathing space' we had mentioned when talking about aspect ratios? It means the area around your subject and the size of this area is based on what emotion you want to evoke from the shot. More breathing space depicts a relaxed state, reducing the breathing space intensifies the situation. Lead room is an important use of breathing space. If the character or characters are looking in a direction, leaving majority of breathing space on that side of the frame conveys the characters' attention in that direction.

Framing or composing a shot is as artistic as painting a scenery. It is important to provide the most amount of details while providing focus to the right parts.

Clothes or costumes, as it is referred in filmmaking, can be used in framing. A good rule to remember is contrast takes all the attention in the room. If your background has too many props or depicts a messy environment, making the characters wear a color which is not part of the background can bring them out. You can also plan on your background beforehand and try to put objects of similar colors in it. This would give your background a unified tone and therefore make it easy to let the character stand out. A quick tip, do not make your characters wear narrow stripes or any other intricate patterns. This might confuse the camera and create wavy effects on the clothing.

Camera Movements and Shot Variety

A video which is single long static shot is one of the most boring things to watch. It's not impossible to make a long static shot interesting, but due to how difficult it is to undertake, it is not-recommended for beginners.

So what do you do? Use multiple cameras to create a variety of shots and move your camera around.

The variety can also be achieved using a single camera. But it would require multiple retakes and proper alignment of the characters so that the continuity is not lost. This would result in more time consumed so planning it in the pre-production phase would save a lot of hassle.

The cuts can be used in similar ways as the example of a kid waiting outside the principal's office. Or if your videos involve a tutorial aspect to it, using a medium shot to show you performing the actions and then
