

you can merge multiple videos, trim different clips, add captions and music to the video. You can even add certain effects (there's a small section available).

If you lack any other video editor, you can start practicing on this. The learning is easy with the built-in editor and could act as a template for how to edit using an advanced editor. Also, to make small, quick edits on existing videos, you would rarely need anything else.

Getting free sound effects and music from the audio library

Being a video creator in YouTube means that sooner or later, you would encounter the problem of licensing. If you use copyrighted soundtracks in your videos without permission, there's a good chance that YouTube would take the video off the air. To help you not get into such troubles, YouTube itself provides a music collection which is either free or comes with licenses that permit you to use it in your videos.

Completely free libraries may give you more number of low-quality music than anything. But YouTube being also a music service has privileged relationship with certain artists. That's why the ad-supported section in the library has popular songs which can be used under certain conditions.

If songs are not chosen wisely, a video using a particular song may get blocked in certain countries (due to the differences in the licensing agreement for the song in different countries). Or maybe you wouldn't be able to monetise the video.
