

to buy only one license to use anything from their vast collection of over 30,000 tracks.

And what are the legalities when you want to cover a song on your channel?

Covering a channel can be considered a copyright violation but there are ways to come around it. A cover of a song can come under Fair use as it is your interpretation of someone else's work and not actually just ripping them off. So cover the song in a way that is 'yours', adding an original touch to it.

And what if I am caught using some copyrighted work in my video?

See, if your channel isn't popular enough and you are not making tons of money from your videos, you can fly under the radar and stay there too. There are so many videos online that use copyrighted material in ways which don't come under fair view but are still up. Chances are that is because there are so many of them and they have very little effect on the original work, and hence, are ignored. But remember once you start making money or getting popular using someone else's work, they can come after you, and probably will. Your videos can be pulled down, your YouTube account shut down, and you can be sued.

Fair use myths debunked

There are a number of myths surrounding fair use, what comes under it and what doesn't. We are here to bust all of them.

#1 My video has been up for some time and I am using copyrighted content but no has sued me. Yet. I am not doing anything wrong probably.

Internet is huge. There are millions of videos and songs.. And probably this is why you are safe till now. So don't think that if you haven't been caught till now, you are not doing anything wrong

#2 I am not earning anything through my channel. Why will someone sue me?

Whether or not you are earning money through the work is not the only deciding factor behind you getting sued or not, though it is an important one. You can still be sued if your work is taking away views from the original video, and it doesn't follow the fair use guidelines.
