

#3 I gave due to credit to the original artist in the description box and my intentions are perfectly good so I am safe.

We don't live in a perfect world and your intentions are not always good enough. So even if you have given credit to the original artist in the description box and have a good heart, you can still be sued.

#4 I used very little of the copyrighted work so I am in the clear.

There is no specific amount of copying that is allowed. You can be sued for using only a couple of seconds of the work, if the artist decides so. But as a golden rule, use as little as you need and no more.

#5 I added the line “no copyright infringement intended” to the beginning of my video so I am safe.

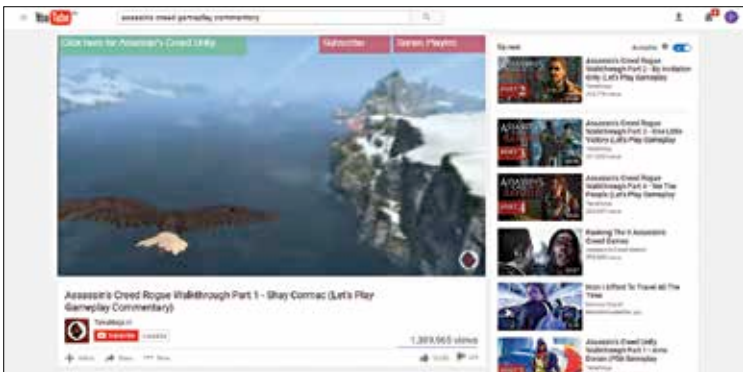

Sorry to tell you this, but no, just adding “no copyright infringement intended” to your video doesn't mean that you are not liable.

Okay I am confused now, so what exactly is allowed under fair use then?

Don't worry it's normal to get confused. Let us break it down for you.

Video games with commentary

One of the most popular genre of videos, videos of people playing video games with commentary in the background or tutorial videos, have led to

Video game commentary has spawned a whole generation of YouTubers even though it still lies in the gray area of copyright laws
