

some of the biggest channels on YouTube and created a couple of YouTube millionaires too. It still lies in the gray area, but most of the times you or your work won't be sued because you are indirectly contributing to the popularity and sales of the game.

Parodies, critiques and reviews

Another popular genre of videos on YouTube is parodies, critiques and reviews of popular TV shows, animes and movies and their legality is a

Review and critique videos are generally allowed under fair use little easier to determine. They are specifically protected under the Fair Use purview. You can use video and audio clippings, scenes and other original work from the video to make your point. But don't go overboard and use only as much as you need.

Background music

Well, simply put the only case where a copyrighted track can be used as background music is allowed if it was incidental. That is, if you are shooting a video somewhere and a band is playing some music or a track is playing somewhere in the background, it is okay.

Mashups

Mashups of songs or videos can come under fair use if they showcase your creativity. You can make mashups, just keep in mind that you are not just slicing and putting together a couple of copyrighted work but actually transforming it into something new and original.