

Consistency

Consistency matters with a lot of parameters around the YouTube world. When your audience has already been trained to expect videos to come in around a consistent schedule with TV shows, you need to maintain that consistency with YouTube as well. After all, you are, in a manner of speaking, replacing their TV shows with your YouTube videos and tapping into this rhythm that has come to be over the years.

Be consistent with your YouTube channel

YouTube's algorithms change on a regular basis and being part of the community helps you understand these changes better. Recently, YouTube started (supposedly) promoting channels that publish at least two videos a week compared to those channels which weren't so frequent. As a result, a lot of YouTubers changed their schedules to accommodate for the higher video production schedule.

Aside from time, you need to maintain consistency with your show's format as well. Now, this doesn't mean that you shouldn't evolve with the times. When we say consistency, we mean that you should fixate on a format. Very few people have a myriad number of interests so making your channel about a few topics would be ideal. Of course, there do exist channels in which absolutely anything random happens but very few find success in terms of a lasting following. Let's say you do listers on your YouTube channel. Your
