

What are MCNs? Are they worth joining?

MCNs or Multi Channel Networks can be called the talent management companies of YouTube. They are third party service providers, which you can join and they will take care of a number of things for you including getting brand deals, helping you with content productions, getting you in touch with celebrities and other YouTube stars for collaboration, in exchange for a cut of the profit you are making or rights over the content you are creating.

Joining a MCN can be beneficial but there are a number of things you need to keep in mind including reading the fine prints on the contract.

There are a number of Multi Channel Networks on YouTube though remember they are neither endorsed by Google or YouTube. There are Maker studio is one of the most famous MCN on YouTube. They are behind the 'Rap battles of history' saga videos and have partnered with a number of other famous channels some key points that you need to understand before you decide on joining an MCN which include

- Your revenue will flow through your MCN's AdSense account instead of yours. They will take the pre decided share from the revenue and pay you the rest.
- Make sure whatever you are promised, be it brand sponsorships, or a dedicated sales and marketing team for your channel, it is written down clearly in the contract.

Lately MCNs have earned a bad reputation for themselves because of stingy and shady contract deals and empty promises. So is joining a MCN worth the effort and trust?
