

growth than someone who uploads sporadic content. It is also important to follow up with the content you've posted. YouTube comments can be nasty, but can also provide good insights into audience behaviour and the kind of content people prefer. On the other hand, YouTube is used by a lot of brands to promote their products and content and these channels have exorbitantly high budgets and backing from professional production studios. If you're someone who's just starting off, you'll need to study the mechanics of how YouTube deals with its content and how to make your audiences grow organically.

You'll also find that a lot of YouTubers put all their effort and time into their channel, and eventually make this their day job. While this is not impossible, it is very hard. Initially, you'll need to ensure that your channel is being properly monetized and the payout you're getting covers at least the basic cost of content production. Most YouTubers also tailor the content according to their audiences. This will help you engage with your audience better. d
