

Days Of Arcade

A new industry was born. Kids were suddenly spending all their pocket money in a magical place called a 'Video Game Arcade'. Arcade video gaming was a huge thing in the '80s worldwide. Atari was the company that started it all with Pong! And now people wanted new and interesting ways to play these 'video games'. However, those days, gaming wasn't accessible to anyone unless they were rich enough. The rest of the people had access to these beloved arcade houses where kids and adults spent hours toiling away to break their high scores on games like Pac-Man and Space Invaders. Gaming was a business and these arcade owners were, in a way, the middle men. They purchased these costly arcade sets or cut deals with the gaming houses. And there was a lot of money to be had.

Nothing says '80s like these retrowave arcades. You can almost hear the synth music.

By 1981, the arcade gaming industry had a worth of 8 Billion USD (26 Billion with respect to 2017). Sega and Taito were the first companies to get success but it was Atari that changed the face of the gaming community. In 1972, Atari retailed Pong For $1095. Back in these days even multiplayer gaming used to be restricted to gaming on the same screen. There was no connectivity amongst arcade games. But this 'golden era' or arcade gaming gave us a lot of gems that gamers still cherish to this day.

You Can Play Games at Home Now

The Atari Arcade systems were such a big hit that they decided to bring that experience to every home. They took inspiration from the Magnavox