

It's (probably) worth it

A true Mac user finds the clunky hardware on ordinary desktop PCs unwieldy and distracting. He gapes at the massive external PC case taking up so much space, and making so much noise with its cooling fan! He grows quickly irritated with the tiresome wired mouse, with dust constantly jamming its clicker.

He doesn't understand the Windows environment – why are there so many ways to do one simple thing? He frowns at the X button being placed on the top right instead of the top left. He groans at the alien concept of viruses – shouldn't all viruses be alien?

His pocket takes a battering every so often, when even a bit of hardware needs replacing. He often needs expensive connector cables and external hardware to do things that ordinary mortals consider commonplace – port out to HDMI screens, read a disc, or connect to a non-wireless printer.

But for the most part, the Mac user is a happy, self-content soul, particularly when he is shifting his office and his workstation is a single movable piece. d
