

Safari isn't always the smartest browser of the bunch

For starters, anybody who is deeper entrenched into the Google ecosystem (Gmail, Google Drive, Hangouts, Google Docs and so on) is almost certainly better off using Chrome. Chrome integrates exceedingly well with all Google based services. Safari's major advantage is only in terms of its beautiful and convenient interfacing with the Apple suite of software.

Similarly, extension aficionados may find that their friends who use Google Chrome have a far, far greater variety of quirky, interesting, and sometimes even useful extensions to pick from. Extensions that may never even reach the Safari web extensions list. Apple's pickiness about its developers tends to limit personal freedom on a web-browser in this sense.

All in all, as far as speed and performance go, Safari fares decently, but Chrome is almost universally regarded as the winner. While Safari may be able to pick and choose its victories, Chrome typically takes the bulk of the prizes, and Safari users may just find themselves having to make that dreaded choice – Apple or Google? d
