

jack, it did sell well relatively. Sales report seem to suggest that the buying has become sluggish lately, perhaps by the fact that the people are waiting for the next iPhone.

There is indeed a lot of 'hype' for the next iPhone. It's rumoured to break away from the tick-tock scheme and therefore won't be a 7s or a merely improved version of the existing 7. Since this year also marks the 10 year anniversary of the iPhone, people are expecting great things from the new one. The list of features it's rumoured to have includes a bezeless display, a home button that's integrated into the screen itself, wireless charging and much more. It is indeed exciting to wait for a new product with such bated breath. As we draw close to the product launch, only time will tell whether Apple will shake up the industry again as they did a decade ago? Or has their time passed? For the competition is quite fierce now and people are starting to find alternatives enticing.
