

Ecosystem : The ecosystem is king.

connecting to special keyboard cases. They also usually feature very good cameras and 4 stereo speakers. The iPad Pros are aimed at people who need an ultra - ultraportable and don't really mind not having a full fledged OS.

Why do people even buy iPads?

Tablets seem like a niche device. Dropping lots of money on a good tablet is often derided because you can just get a laptop that can vastly outperform the tablet for just a little more or even the same amount of money. But what you are giving up with a laptop is the absolute convenience of having just a screen to tote around. Tablets are hands down one of the best portable multimedia consumption devices available in the market today, and they are quite versatile too – for those moments when your phone is just too small but busting out your laptop is too much of a hassle. Ok so tablets have their uses; though why iPads specifically? Well for one, there's only token competition from the Android side. Added to the fact that the iPads, like all Apple products are incredibly well made and have thousands and thousands of apps and games optimised to run on the hardware. If you want a tablet, getting an iPad over anything else is a no brainer. But the most important reason would be to continue in the ecosystem. iOS devices work seamlessly with each other and macOS and so if you are already in the ecosystem, getting an iPad just makes the whole process a lot smoother. As discussed in part 1 of this FastTrack, you can Airdrop files easily, open up the same webpages and even cast the screen
