

While personalisation may be a good idea, it certainly limits the possibility of stumbling upon the unknown! Research suggests that when your search is optimised by Google, more often than not, it shows you pages you have visited before on top of the list. Now that prevents you from coming across results that could now be relevant to you unlike the previous times! It also limits the search options of people who search on your computer – they see what you saw!

Other search products

Apart from the usual search options, Google search provides additional search products such as calendar, time, weather, currency, weight conversion, area code, timer, stock quotes, and more. In fact, there are 22 additional products. Most of these results can be accessed just by entering the keywords into the search bar. So if you type – ‘Moscow time’ in the search bar, the current time in Moscow will appear right below your typed-in search, no need to click anything to know.

Other features such as Google News, Image search, Maps, etc have their own tabs and also show up in the search results. Google News curates news from other sites, and lists them in order of the time the story was published. If the topic is popular, such as something about a famous personality, politi-
