

Google Doodle

Anyone who has used Google search has seen the Google Doodle. These are the fun, and even interactive ways in which Google plays with its own logo for special occasions (almost on a daily basis).

Google celebrates noted artists and personalities like John Lennon, Rene Magritte, Rabindranath Tagore, Ella Fitzgerald, Satyajit Ray among others. Some common themes of Doodle include Earth Day, Halloween, Olympics, and many more. It's also very localised, and, for example, every 26th of January, Google India will celebrate Republic Day via a Doodle, while Google Australia will celebrate Australia Day in their own way.

The first Google Doodle was to mark the Burning Man Festival of 1998, designed by the founders themselves. Some of the artists and illustrators – also known as Doodlers – include Ekua Holmes, Jennifer Hom and Dennis Hwang.

Burning Man Festival - the first Google doodle

Rivals? Alternatives, maybe!

While Google is the most popular search engine, there are still alternatives that hold tiny bits of the global market share. Figures show that Google holds a whopping 77% of the world share among all search engines as of April 2017. Let's look at the other options:

Bing

Launched in 2009, replacing its predecessor LiveSearch, Bing is Microsoft's attempt at competing with Google. It holds a mere 7% of the market share, but even that is an improvement over when it was launched.

Yahoo! Search

Back in 1998, Yahoo! was the most popular search engine, a mere four years