

How it works

Before we jump into the services offered under Google Ads, let's understand how the basic search and ad-serving process works. Whenever you enter a keyword into the Google search bar, it's added to a vast database where all the keywords entered by other users are stored. With the knowledge of the content you're interested in, Google will now be capable of serving you related content through ads rather than displaying something you might not click at all. So the next time you're browsing online, the ads you come across on websites will be related to your history. Businesses that have subscribed to the ad network will enable this on their websites so that there's a higher chance of you clicking on them.

When you're looking for a specific product such as a t-shirt or smartphone, you'll see extra search results either on the top or right side of the webpage tagged as "Sponsored". This tab will only consist of products that are listed and selling on e-commerce websites, who are part of one of the services called Google Shopping Campaigns (more on this later). Apart from the "Sponsored" tab, you'll sometimes notice search results with an "Ad" tag as well. These results are based on AdWords which we'll be covering later. But just to give you an idea, AdWords is the advertising platform where businesses subscribe to serve ads related to their business. When you subscribe to Google's advertising platform, your ad holds the potential to be displayed across several avenues including Google's own platforms. Your ads can appear as links in Google Search results, display ads on websites, video ads in YouTube, shopping ads for products in search results and inside
