

mobile apps. There are a few tools by Google that allow customers to take advantage of the advertising service. Businesses get to have an exhaustive number of features available to them so that they drive ads and set targets according to their convenience. Let's have a look at the main components.

AdWords

AdWords is Google's advertising platform which consists of tools and services that lets businesses and individuals drive customers to their respective marketplaces. If you're interested in promoting your products or website, this service will allow you to reach your desired demographic. This is done through ads served through various avenues which can be tweaked around to a granular level using AdWords. Although a rough explanation has already been provided on how advertising works, there's more to this particular service. You already know that ads are served to you based on the keywords you enter. Businesses can use those keywords that are relevant to their business and push their ads to people entering the same keywords. This allows businesses an added visibility to potential customers searching for them by placing these ads above or beside the search results.

The keywords don't need to be specific since related keywords are also served based on what the business applies for. Say you are searching for solutions to a blue screen error on Windows, you will enter the search query of something like "how to solve blue screen error on Windows". After you hit enter, Google will search through the billions of webpages that it has indexed, to search for the exact and also relevant keywords. Eventually, it will throw a list of webpages where your keywords or query appears in some form or the other. Websites who have subscribed to AdWords will be able to appear above or beside the organically indexed search results related to fixing the blue screen error. If a website wants its webpages to appear before the organic search results, going through AdWords is the only way, provided you have the budget. If your website doesn't appear in the top search results, this is one way of gaining visibility. Google says that there's no way paid ads would ever appear as organic search results, and this is because if you're using AdWords to boost yourself in the search results, your webpages will be tagged as an "Ad".

The service is quite granular, allowing you to push ads to specific locations, at specific times of the day, etc. In this way, you have the freedom to target the ads and monitor the activity from their dashboard. You can also choose the amount you want to spend on ads, and if you start seeing results, you can accordingly scale up your spending. Aiming for more than just one
