

The screenshot shows a Google search interface with the query "buy google pixel". The search results are filtered to show "Sponsored" shopping ads. The top section, titled "Shop for buy google pixel on Google", displays five product cards for Google Pixel phones. Each card includes a product image, the model name, color, storage capacity, price, and the retailer. Below the product cards, there are three text-based sponsored ads. The first ad promotes the Google Pixel Phone as a new Android phone from Google, listing features like Virtual Assistant, Super Low-light Shots, and Unlimited Storage. The second ad is for a Google Pixel sale on eBay, offering up to 60% off. The third ad is for the Google Store, highlighting the Pixel and Pixel XL phones and their features.

product or content type? As a business selling different products, you can create different ad groups for say shoes, trousers and hats. You can create ad campaigns based on these ad groups by further deciding the intricacies of targeting as mentioned above. If you're a business selling shoes, you will be able to place ads on websites speaking about shoes such as fitness and lifestyle publications. It also works for local businesses like floral shops and restaurants. Their ads will be shown to local people and the users looking for their services will be able to easily refer to the ad to visit or call them up (even easier through mobile ads). AdWords works for both, products and webpages. For products, advertisers can opt for Google Shopping Campaigns to push their ads. Ads for products are visible in search results, images and on YouTube as well. Even if you're subscribed into AdWords, you will need to create a Merchant Center account. Once created, you will be able to create the campaign and select through various fields for targeting. So, whenever you see products listed under the "Sponsored" tab in search results, you now know that those have been served through shopping campaigns.

Advertisers will only be charged when people click on those ads. Paying
