

for the service doesn't guarantee you a top spot in the search results since there are thousands of services competing for visibility. The main factors affecting your chances of showing up in the search results are the advertiser's bid and their quality score. The bid is self-explanatory meaning there's an auction that decides which ad appears in search. The deciding factor is how much an advertiser is willing to pay when a user clicks on the ad. Quality score is something you gain based on the relevancy between your ad and the website or webpage it points to. Other factors include ad extensions which are extra links such as call-to-action buttons (calling to a phone number), links to specific and relevant pages, and even location for local businesses. By passing all these factors, an ad will be shown in the search results, which is called as an impression. So, whenever an ad is displayed successfully to users, it will be counted as an impression, giving you an idea on how many times people viewed your ad. When the user clicks on the ad, the advertiser pays the service. AdWords is split into two networks including the Search and Display network.

AdWords Express

AdWords is a comprehensive tool for advertising and not all businesses need such a platform. To serve such customers, Google has a dumbed down version of AdWords called AdWords Express. It doesn't have all the features, but is easier to setup and use. Rather than having to deal with so many fields of targeting, Express only requires you to add the services your
