

slots are auctioned through AdWords, and depending on your site and the traffic it gets, and the types of visitors, interested advertisers will bid to get their ad into your ad space. Eventually, you'll be paid based on how many visitors to your website view or click on those ads.

To increase the chances of users clicking on ads placed on your website, you should opt for Custom Search ads. What this means is that if you have a search field for your website, when a user enters a search query into it, the relevant content from your website will be displayed along with ads related to the query. Thus, even if they don't find content they're looking for on your website, they still get clickable links which earn you money. If you have video content on your website, you can add in-stream or overlay ads with AdSense. Gaming sites can also opt for the service to serve ads in web-based games.

If you've built a mobile app and published it to an app store, you eventually want to start earning money from it. Some developers offer this via paid apps, but most need to keep their apps free in order to reach the largest user base. Chances are, your app is free as well, and thus, advertising is the way you make your money. If you're looking for ads for your app, AdMob is what you need. The service lets you monetise your app by displaying ads from Google advertisers inside the app. This service isn't restricted to just Android and you'll be able to monetise iOS and Windows apps as well. All of us have come across ads when using apps – some are really intrusive, while some
