

Are you feeling lucky?

If one looks at the story of Google, and its founders Larry Page and Sergey Brin, one might feel that luck had a role to play in their meteoric rise to success, but the details suggest otherwise. Google has grown over the years from a mere search engine (albeit a darn good one) to an ecosystem that has its tendrils in just about everything. Today, irrespective of how entrenched you are in any competing ecosystem, it is nearly impossible to not encounter Google and its products in your tech-life.

If nothing else, Google search is something you're definitely using. Heck, the brand is pretty much become the verb for running an internet search – “just Google it”, is something we say all the time! Even if you're not just a user, and are a content creator, you know the importance of having a high Google search rank for your chosen search terms. Then there's Google's online advertising juggernaut that anyone selling (or even buying) anything online has to contend with. If you're not advertising inside the Facebook ecosystem, you're pretty much left with Google.

If there's another area where Google has a clear majority over all other tech companies, it is the smartphone operating system market. With Android, Google pretty much dominates this area single-handedly, and it doesn't look like it's giving up that share anytime soon. Even though Android Wear hasn't seen similar success, you never know what Google has in store for its future.

Of course, there's still a lot more to Google's ecosystem than that. There's also hardware in terms of Nexus devices, those Google home